Currently, we are building a website that should not be permanently live, should instead be available when queried. We want to host this on Azure, which means we will be running an instance of our web site. However, we want to keep this instance alive while our server is down, and then bring it up when we need it. I'm a web developer, so I'm used to working with servers that are alive the entire time, even while we work on our sites. I don't know what the best practice is for deploying a static web site in Azure. Currently, we are backing up our live SQL Server to the cloud, and deploying the website to a new instance. When we need to bring it back, we will load the backup on the new server. A: Create a load balanced Azure website and deploy your website in there. Q: Why was I not the only person on this site during the last update? I logged in yesterday morning, and the site looked like this: This indicates that the site has been updated 2-4 times today; the next update occurred at 3:56PM EST. Why were there 5 people on the site during that time period? A: The post was generated by an automated system when we trigger a question for the first time We get dozens of questions at a time from non-registered users like you. To stop that from happening, we have a system that runs through the list of new questions every few minutes and tries to create some basic content like a description and a title. When the question is upvoted and gets a good score f678ea9f9c
